Catalyzing a movement to reinvent modern education

The US education system is broken.

Our nation needs to redefine outcomes for the modern age.

The current model was established over 100 years ago by the Carnegie Foundation to streamline education and replace the single room schoolhouse. Industrial Revolution thinking led to an assembly-line mentality that is now outdated. Instead of focusing on memorization of freely available information, modern schools need to emphasize modern skills.

The movement has already begun.

Director Greg Whitely, Mitt (2014), will release a documentary about education reform in 2015, contrasting successful modern schools like High Tech High with the antiquated schools around the country. The film urges administrators, teachers, parents, and students to question whether their schools make sense in an increasingly innovative world.

Our work helps people become involved.
